Parenting for Prevention

“Okay, time to go—hugs, kisses, high fives, whatever you want to do.”

That is what my daughter, Sarah, told our young grandchildren when it was time to head for the car at the end of a visit. It was her way of telling them to say their goodbyes.

It didn't really strike me until the third or fourth time I heard her say that, or something like it. Then I realized that she was putting the children in charge of what kind of goodbye they would give. Sometimes it's a hug or a kiss. At others a hand slap or wave. Or maybe the “goodbye” is a small face shyly pressed into Sarah's shoulder.

“Whatever you want to do!” How much better than being commanded to “give hugs” to Aunt Mary, Uncle Joe, or Mrs. Williams, or to all three of them.

As a seasoned child protective service worker, Sarah has seen what happens when children are raised without choices or power. She is parenting to help her children develop healthy boundaries and understand the importance of consent from their earliest years.
